Subject: Dancing Lights

Hi,

Over the past two weeks the same event has been witnessed by myself and my girlfriend twice, and a third person on a completely independant occasion.

Last night (15/07/09) at around about 23.30, I myself any my girlfriend noticed what seemed to be a very bright white light, almost like a large Star, appearing to move slowly in the sky, north-West of Trimley St Mary, Suffolk, above the river Orwell.

The Light to moved south, doubled back on itself in a smooth motion to its original position in sky, at which point a similar light suddenly appeared with it.

The two lights almost "danced" around each other, each making out one equal half of a circle, before splitting of in completely opposite directions. The original light quickly veered towards our position, whilst the newer light moved off at speed towards the north west, away from us.

At this point it became apparent that the lights were either moving at speed or were much lower in the air that first apparent.

The Light cruised above us, and I noticed that unlike most aircraft there was only this single bright white light, no repeating flashes, or different coloured lights usually seen.

(There were at least 3 other conventional aircraft in the sky at the time with which to compare the object) A vauge black outline could be made out surrounding the light against the night sky, however this may have just been wishful thinking from my eyes, trying to imagine the shape.

As I commented, there were other aircraft in the sky, and a vauge drone could be heard from the one closest to us, however the "Light" made absolutely no noise what so ever. Also in comparisons with the other aircraft, this Light was clearly closer to us that expected.

As the Light reached almost immediately overhead, it dissapeared instantaneously. At that point in time, there was very little cloud cover and the Stars could be seen clearly, so I ruled out the disruption if cloud cover. The previously bright white light, simply dissapeared before us.

Ususally I would have put something such as this down to perhaps just a normal aircraft, a chinese lantern or just an odd experience.

However, as I mentioned, this is the second time in two weeks both myself and my girlfriend have witnessed the exact same sequence of events, over the same time scale. Last time I had just brushed the sighting off as "odd".

We arrived at my girlfriends house, and began to tell her mum of what we've just seen. At which point she interupted, stating that she had seen the exact same thing, with incredibly similar movements the previous week. Describing the "dance" as if she had seen through my own eyes. She was unaware of what we had seen, and visa versa.

The only objects that I can think resembles the light most simply, by way of an explanation, are chinese lanterns. But this wouldn't explain the "dance", or the fact the two moved off in opposite directions. (Particularly the one above us, moving against the wind). The lights were just far too bright to be lanterns in my opinion, and acted and looked so unlike conventional aircraft that I cannot think of an explanation.

Yours Sincerely,
